Reconsidered

By Nellie Cravey Gilmore

The girl hurried swiftly along the pavement. Her full red lips were crimped into a jaquemint rosebud, while a tiny frown drew her black brows together in a way that boded no leniency toward the offender.

At the end of the square she paused and glanced anxiously up and down the intersecting avenue. With some impatience she drew forth her watch; but before she had had time to restore the jeweled timepiece to her belt, a man rounded the next corner, and came directly toward her. He, too, was walking swiftly, and with head bent. Within a few feet of the girl, he glanced up intuitively, a look of surprise chasing the latent gloom from his face.

"Zarelda!"
"I was obliged to see you," she remarked, icily, "to—return—this. I wanted to be certain it was delivered safely." She drew from her bag a small square package and held it out to him.

Hayburn whitened. The ring! Not the one he had hoped to give her before long, but the little turquoise thing he had slipped upon her finger in the dear old boy-and-girl days, and which had been waiting there ever since to be replaced by another.

"I'm afraid I don't quite understand, Zarelda," he said, hoarsely. "Has anything—gone wrong?"

"I have accepted Harry Borden," was all she said.

"At least I should think—don't you think—that you owe me some sort of explanation?" His eyes deepened.

The girl colored with her ready flush. "I have written," she faltered, "you will find the letter awaiting you at home. I omitted to—enclose the ring, and that is why—why I came here."

The girl hesitated for an indeterminate second; the blood rose darkly to her temples. Then, with a little catch of her breath, she demanded: "Why did you take Lily Lester to the Carson's cottol when we—"

"Why did you go there with Harry Borden?"

"I understood—from him—that you had asked her—"

"I asked her only when I learned that you and he were going together."

For an instant they stood there with locked eyes.

"It was all a horrible mistake, Zarelda," Hayburn said at last, "for which our life's happiness will have to pay the penalty."

To his astonishment the girl turned from him abruptly. "You were ridiculously attentive to her, anyway," she burst at him angrily over her shoulder. "Good-by." She walked rapidly down the avenue and left him standing there. He waited a moment, and then crossed the street mechanically and caught a car for home.

Sure enough, the girl's letter was waiting for him there. He tore it open avidly and read:

"Teddy: under separate cover I am returning to you your ring. As I am soon to become Harry Borden's wife I do not feel as though I ought to keep it, even if it was but a simple token of friendship between us."

Hayburn flung down the letter sharply. Token of friendship! It cut like a knife. And what was worse, she had loved him, and in a fit of pique had gone deliberately to work and betrothed herself to that cad! He had given—eighths of a mind to run that individual down and tell him the truth—and if he still refused to give up the girl, to choke him to death on the spot. But the rational eighth probably saved his life, for he proceeded to calm himself immediately, and read the remainder of the letter: "You must not attempt to see me, for we shall in all likelihood be married to-morrow and sail at once for Norway."

Again he threw down the crumpled sheet, and straightway called a cab and drove to her home.

She did not keep him waiting. "As you are leaving so soon," Hayburn began when she came into the room, "I shall try not to detain you longer than is necessary. But there was something I was obliged to return to you, and that is why I am here," he hurried on, mockingly, but courteous to a degree. "This little photograph you gave me several years ago."

A little involuntary exclamation escaped the girl's white lips. She half swayed as she put out one slender hand to the back of a chair for support. But in a moment she had collected herself and held out her hand matter-of-factly for the picture.

"Good-by, Zarelda," he said, and held out his hand.

She raised her eyes with a look that was in every way cool and undisturbed. "Good-by," she answered steadily.

He crushed her fingers and turned toward the door. Half way there the sound of his name, called in a sweet, quivering treble, caused Hayburn to turn with a swift heart-beat.

"Oh, Zarelda!" he cried, "why did you?" He looked at her with heart-broken eyes.

"I—I didn't," she whispered with her face in her hands.

"But Borden—you told him—"

"I wrote him," she interposed, tremulously.

"Worse! Now he's got it in black and white."

"Not—not yet!"

"What do you mean?" he demanded fiercely; his unconscious hands gripped her delicate wrists till she winced.

"I—I might fear it up," she sobbed, against his coat.

The members of the Young Ladies' Sewing club were most delightfully entertained yesterday morning by Miss Charlotte Hayward, at her home on Grand avenue. Light refreshments were served on the lawn in the shade of the beautiful trees at the Hayward home. Those present besides the hostess were Mrs. H. Earl Hoke, Mrs. H. E. Fell, Miss Lida Vasse, Miss Elba Stonerod and Miss Dottie Hoskins.
